Learning Objectives
Through this lesson students will be able to:

- Compare duties of, functions of, and relationships between members of legislative, executive, and judicial branches of local, state, and national government.
- Explain how and why powers are distributed between local, state, and national governments.
- Illustrate the law making process at each level, as well as obligations and services of each level.
- Evaluate the major changes/events that have affected the roles of local, state, and national government.

STEP BY STEP

- DISTRIBUTE the reading to the class and the graphic organizer (OPTIONAL—graphic organizer can also be distributed after the reading has been completed).
- READ through the reading pages together as a class.
- CHECK for understanding using the active participation activity (see teacher activity guide for instructions).
- ASSIGN students to complete the graphic notes individually, in pairs, or as a whole class activity.
- REVIEW the graphic notes together as a class.

  OPTIONAL: Create a transparency of the graphic organizer and allow students to approach the projector/board to fill in the graphic organizer one blank at a time.

- PROJECT the Venn diagram and distribute “powers” cards to each student. Alternatively, draw a large Venn diagram on the board, labeled to reflect the Venn diagram included in the lesson plan.
- INSTRUCT students to approach the board one at a time and place the power where they think it should go. Constructively correct students, guiding them toward the correct answer. After each card is placed, take the opportunity to engage students in a very brief discussion about why each power is assigned to the federal or state government (or both!).
- ASSIGN the review pages to your students and allow them to complete these pages independently or in pairs/small groups.
- DISCUSS student responses to the State or Local? activity. Student responses may vary, but ask students to defend their answers.
On the Level

Who’s Got the Power?

Can you name the President of the United States? Can you name the governor of your state? Can you name the mayor of your town? Easy! But can you describe the different powers held by each of these individuals? Powers are the duties and roles given to a person in office.

Government on Three Levels

Federalism is the division of power among a central government and smaller regional governments. In the United States, we have a central government known as the federal government. The federal government deals with issues that affect the entire country. Each state also has its own state government that only handles the affairs of that state. Finally, there are local governments in places like towns, counties, and cities. These are the governments closest to you. They deal with issues that must be handled locally, such as maintaining roads and bridges.

Fighting for Control

The founders of our country divided power between the federal government and the state and local governments because they were afraid of a federal government that had too much control. When our founders were writing the Constitution, the country was recovering from the Revolutionary War. In that war, the colonists had rebelled against a strong central government and won their freedom.

Spread It Around

To avoid creating a new government that would be just as controlling as the old one, the founders wrote the Constitution to include the principle of federalism. First, the Constitution created a central federal government with powers that are outlined very clearly. Second, the Constitution says that any power not given to the federal government is a power the states have. This included the states’ ability to develop their own local governments.
Federal Powers

The Constitution assigns, or delegates, specific powers to the federal government. There are three types of delegated powers, and they are the only powers that the federal government holds. Expressed powers are listed clearly in the Constitution. They include the power to print money or declare war. Implied powers are not written out clearly in the Constitution. Instead, the Constitution gives the federal government the power to make laws that are “necessary and proper” for carrying out the expressed powers. For example, the Constitution expressly gives the federal government the power to establish post offices, but it does not expressly give the power to print postage stamps. Postage stamps are a “necessary and proper” part of running a post office, however, so the federal government has the power to print them. Finally, inherent powers are not listed in the Constitution but are necessary for the federal government to function. The Constitution doesn’t talk about immigration or international relations, but the government still has to act on these items. It is understood that the federal government must play a role in these areas.

State Powers

The Constitution does not delegate any specific powers to the states. There is no list of “state powers.” Instead, any power the Constitution does not give to the federal government is reserved to the states. The Constitution does deny powers to the states, meaning there is a listing of things that they can’t do. This may sound like the states don’t have much power, but reserved powers are actually very broad. The Constitution says nothing about many important powers, such as public safety, health, education, licenses, and many other things! All of these powers are reserved to the states. Some state powers do overlap with the federal government, and these are called concurrent powers.

Local Powers

The Constitution says nothing about local governments. That’s because the principle of federalism created by the Constitution has only two levels: the national and the state level. The power to create local governments is a power reserved to the states. Local governments get their power from the state where they are located, and each state gives slightly different powers to its local governments. Counties, cities, towns, townships, boroughs, and parishes are all types of local government.

Usually, the state will make broad laws about things like public safety, health, and education. Then it gives local governments the power to make more detailed laws about these issues or to decide how these laws will be carried out.
Active Participation Activity

After students have completed the reading, use the following active participation activity as a quick check for understanding. Read each item aloud, give students a set amount of time to think, then ask the class to give a thumbs up or thumbs down representing true or false.

1. Federalism promotes a strong central government and gives little power to any other level of government. (False—Federalism is the division of powers among a central government and smaller regional governments).

2. The founders of our country were against federalism and did not include it in the Constitution. (False—Even though some people opposed federalism, it ultimately offered the best compromise between state and federal power).

3. The people who wrote the Constitution were influenced by their experiences as colonists and fighting the Revolutionary War. (True—There were many influences on the founding fathers, but their experiences as colonists were very important).

4. The Constitution of the United States established a central, federal government, with clearly outlined powers. (True—This is the main focus of the U.S. Constitution—the establishment of the federal government).

5. The Constitution defines very specific powers for the states. (False—the Constitution gives all powers not enumerated to the federal government to the states, but does not clearly outline the powers given to the states).

6. The word “delegate” means to take from or to take away. (False—to delegate means to assign).

7. The reason the federal government has “inherent powers” is so it can interact with other nations. (True—The Constitution was mainly concerned with how the federal government would handle domestic issues, so it enumerated very few diplomatic/foreign issues).

8. Powers that are denied to the states are held by local governments. (False—Powers that are denied to the states are held by no one or by the federal government alone).

9. The power to establish local governments is held by the states. (True—State constitutions are responsible for enumerating powers held by local governments.)

10. Each state’s constitution sets up local governments slightly differently. (True—Because states are free to create their own local governments, each state does this in a slightly different way.)
Print money

The founders divided the power between the federal government and state governments because they were afraid of a federal government that had too much control.

Federal Government: The constitution delegates specific powers to the national, or federal government.

Expressed powers are...
Listed clearly in the Constitution

Implied powers are...
Not written in the Constitution, but can be included as being "necessary and proper"

Inherent powers are...
Not in the Constitution, but are needed so the government can function

State Government: The U.S. Constitution does not delegate any specific powers to the states. Any powers not given to the federal government and not denied, are given to the states.

Reserved powers are...
Broad powers given to the states

Denied powers are...
Powers denied to the states

Local Government: Local government is not mentioned in the U.S. Constitution, and local governments get all their power from the states. Every state’s constitution is slightly different, so each state government is slightly different.
